rings the doorbell just as Bodine has finished.

Bodine corners Davis and forces him to produce his bank book, which shows a profit of $20,000. Davis is compelled to give a check for that amount for lavestment in "Double Eye" stock. The countess is ill, but is compelled to see Herman Gabriel, who calls.

Gabriel left a dinner in his bachelor apartment, supposing he had received an astral message from Edythe that she was in peril. Rushing to Davis quarters, he admitted, and the countess, in a supposed trance, predicts the loss of his millions. Davis instructs her to tell him to invest all in the "Druble Eye."

The young millionaire recoils from the suggestion, and the countess asks him to buy "Double Eye" shares for her at the opening of the market. The countess revolus at the scheme to fleece, and again thinks she sees a bloody dagger in Bodine's hands. She is assured that "Double Eye" is a valuable stock. "Wash sales" are effected, which send the quotation of the stock up 5 points.

millionaire must be brought to the brink and pushed off at once.

This course decided upon, he sought out Edythe without delay, and proceeded to relieve his own cross-graned humor by finding fault with her.

"Seems to me you're a confounded long time getting that cub admirer of yours to the point," he frowred black by. "If you showed any kind of gumption, you could have had him twisted around your finger a week ago. How many more months do you intend to dawdle with him before you make him do what you want?"

She glanced up in surprise at the injustice of his charge.

"Why, Ralph," she exclaimed, "it is not ten days yet since Mr. Gabriel made his first visit. And as for not bringing him to the point' as you call it, I have only been your mouthpiece all the way through. Besides, did you not have me advise him only yesterday not to big a hurry to dispose of his present holdings, but to hold back for a good price, so that he would have all the more money to put into 'Double' Eye?"
